Sid is: knowledgeable of the subject area, an effective instructor, and welcomes students' questions both in class and at office hours. He has been a really great TA.

I think changing the style of office hours could help students learn better. I would recommend holding office hours in a conference room with a white board, so that all students and the TA can sit and talk together, instead of the TA addressing one student at a time. That way, students can learn better from each other's questions. This might also save time for the TA, if multiple students have the same question. When explaining a problem, it would help to go over it on a white board where everyone can see the notes. (I guess unless the class is intended to be more competitive... where students shouldn't necessarily learn from each other's questions??? I'm not sure how the class is supposed to be designed).
